Delay in diagnosis of bacteremia contributes to increased mortality. This study was designed to determine the current nationwide status of the diagnostic delay and to evaluate the risk factors associated with such delay. A retrospective review was performed for the patients newly diagnosed with hematologic malignancy from January 2008 to December 2009 who had 1,380 episodes of bacteremia. The study cohort consisted of 179 patients (31.5%) with bacteremia of which 64 (36.0%) had delayed diagnosis of bacteremia. Approximately one third of the patients (35.2%) did not present to the hospital with symptoms, and the median time from onset of infection to the diagnosis of bacteremia was 1 day (interquartile range [IQR], 0-3 days) for the patients with bacteremia and 3 days (IQR, 1-7 days) for those without bacteremia (p Language status and compliance in Down syndrome.
